Across the country, women are learning how to live their lives with the many opportunities presented to them by the New Order administration.

Political leaders are often in the limelight but sometimes the real heroines, the people that make today's New Order society work, get overlooked.

This is a celebration of some of those that are not always seen in the headlines.

Scientist, Doctor Alice Cosgrave identified Sexually-driven Attention Inadequacy Disorder.

Thanks to her ground breaking research it became possible to devise strategies to combat the problem and ensure that men were not held back by this genetically acquired tendency.

Doctor Cosgrave's pioneering studies led to the nationwide introduction of SAID reduction programmes.

Beth Anderson, Chief Inspector of the Male Control Force, leads from the front.

Her officers have been responsible for establishing a respect for the male control regulations with high levels of conformance.

Detection rates and convictions for male misdemeanours have increased dramatically under her control.

Gabrielle Dinant is chief designer for Horning Chastity Devices.

Recognised as one of the country's most innovative and creative engineers, Gabrielle's designs are now widely used in Government-approved chastity management programmes.

Research at Horning has allowed devices to be created to suit almost every variation in member size and shape, making possible their use right across the male population.

Marianne Statis is the founder of Femnis Gender Management.

Her work on the role of feminisation in the reduction of toxic male behaviour has allowed women across the country to establish new standards for the way men behave in the domestic setting.

Focussing not just on appearance but behaviour and attitudes, the Femnis programmes have contributed to better male behaviours.

Sue Gerat's business "Home Restraints" has become the go-to provider of cages, shackles, pillories and other equipment for the home dungeon.

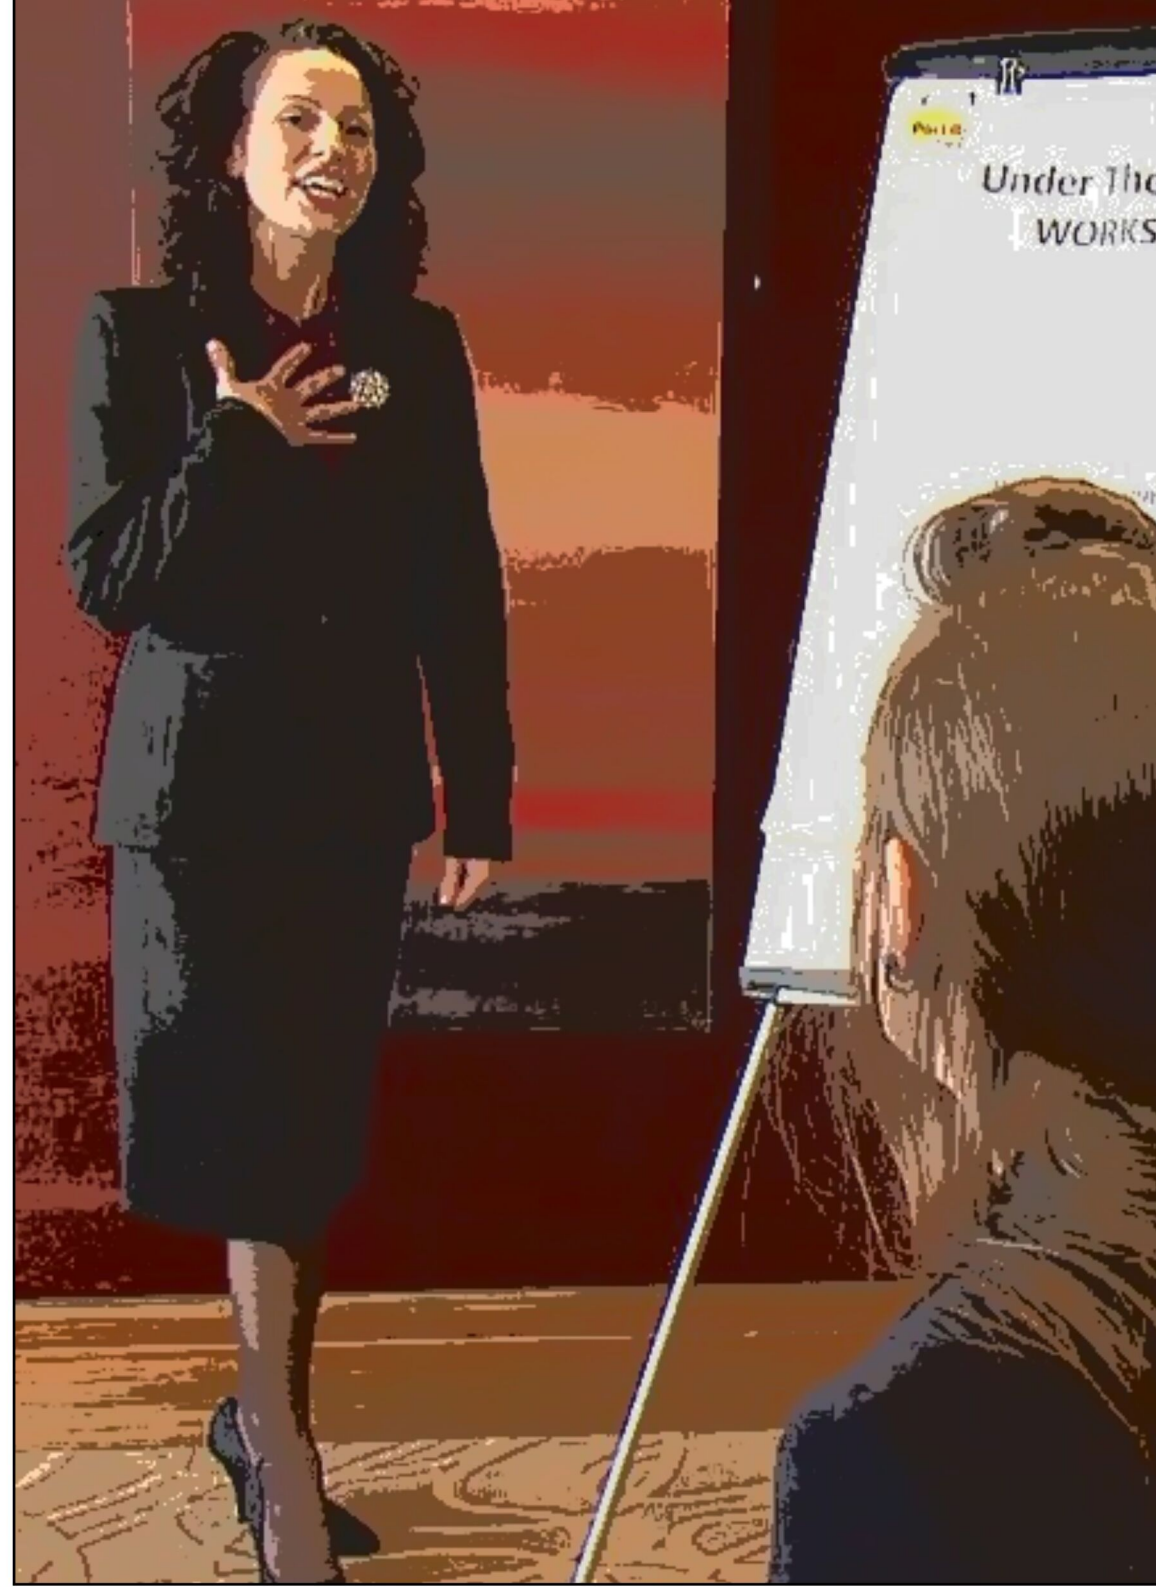

Originally a specialist niche supplier for BDSM enthusiasts and sex workers, Sue Gerat's team have achieved a dramatic scaling up in their manufacturing and supply capability to meet the needs for these devices right across the UK.

Anna Favell is a leading educator.

Her "Under The Thumb" workshops have helped women to learn how to take the lead role in relationships.

Education for women has been an important goal for New Order and Anna's course have allowed tens of thousands of women to acquire the fundamental skills needed to deal with men in a female led society.

Socialite, Lady Angela Ames is widely seen as an important influencer in the world of fashion for the dominant woman.

Her designer label clothes with their intimidating style have become widely popular as women seek to emphasise their new-found positions of power in the home and in the workplace.

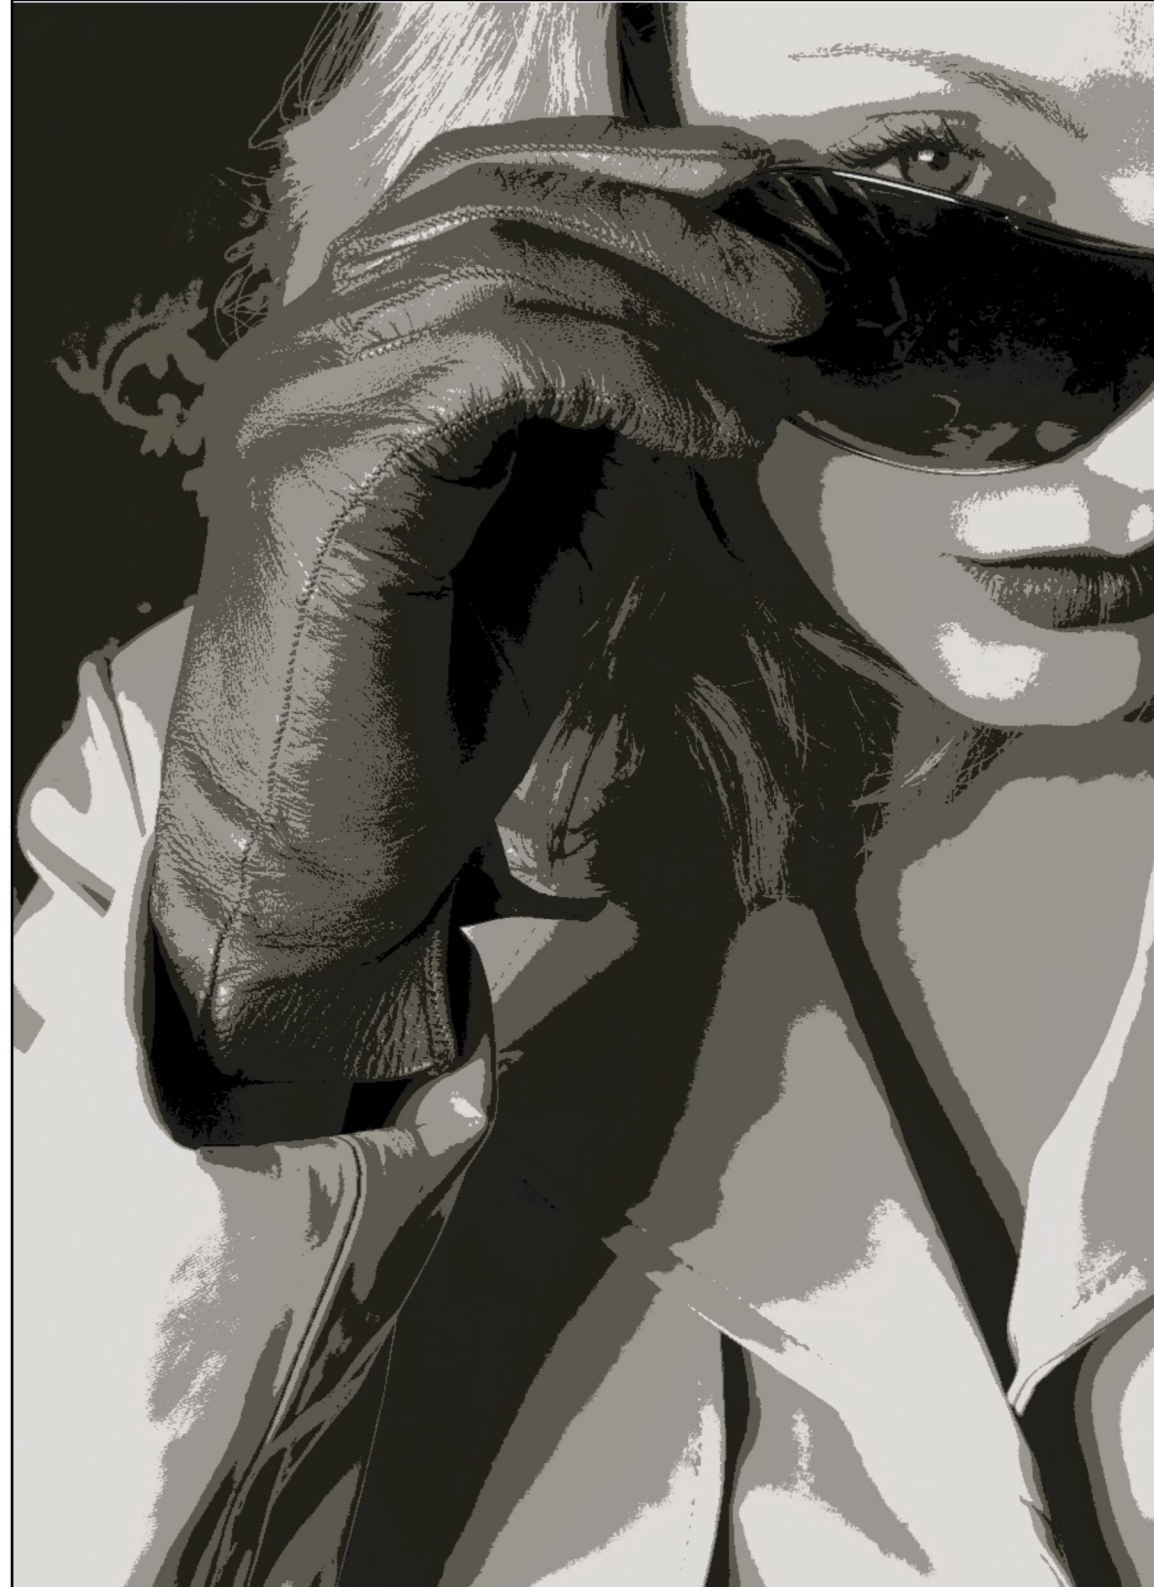

Featuring ethically sourced leather and rubber, Angela's range even includes a animal-free leather product for vegan clients.

Davina Banks, leader of the government's cyber-surveillance and counter-pornography unit has been in the forefront of combating toxic male behaviour.

A shadowy figure who avoids publicity, Davina runs a team that has been the guardians of New Order morality in the on-line world.

They battle daily against dissident elements that seek to overturn the progress made under New Order.

Astrid Thacker, leading lawyer, responsible for drafting much of the male control legislation introduced by New Order.

As an enthusiastic practitioner of female dominance before the New Order government came to power, she was well placed to advise of the best way to turn the party's policy objectives into legal instruments.

Astrid's work ensures New Order governs legally.

Lara, Jenny and Sophie Jason were the joint founders of Dommies-net, the Internet self-help group for women learning to take the lead in their relationship.

With over 10 million regular readers, Dommies-net is the most widely used source of information for women in the UK.

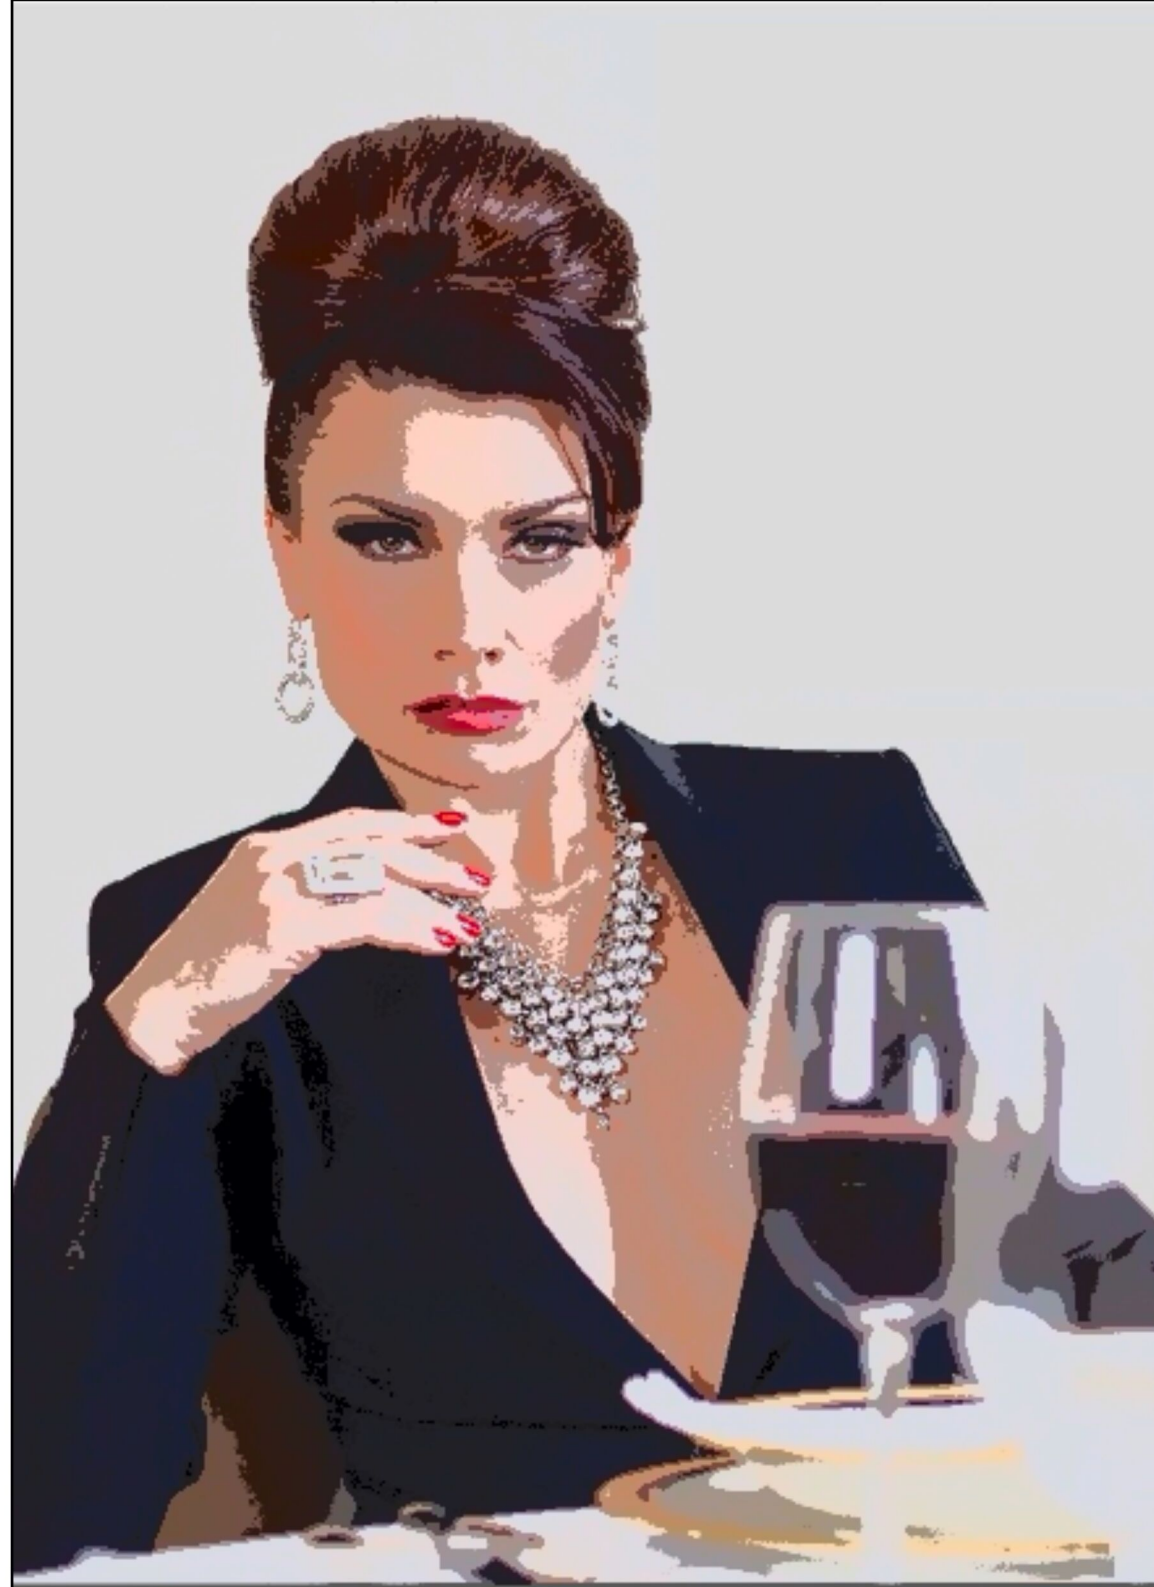

Lara, Jenny and Sophie's videos demonstrating dominance techniques are universally popular.

Cara Hanson's chain of restaurants has become the place for women to enjoy good food in great surroundings.

Her philosophy of women-only dining and male-only servers chimes exactly with the expectations of those women that have benefited from new levels of wealth and leisure under New Order.

Her reputation as a ferocious chef-patron is well earned.

Lucia Orvis is presenter of BBC's "Women Tonight".

A committed communicator, Lucia's interviews and documentaries have covered issues as complex and controversial as male chastity management, home discipline regimes and the control of male financial assets.

Lucia is also adviser to the government on policy communication matters.

Jenna Harrison is the author of "Managing Your Male - Seven Steps To Building The Ideal Female Led Relationship".

Jenna's work in providing helpful, easy-to-follow advice has been a great aid to women throughout the country as they wrestle with the problems of day-to-day male management.

Her no-nonsense guides on dealing with male reluctance to accept feminine leadership are essential reading.

Vanessa Berry is one of the UK's new entrepreneurs.

She has been leading the way in finding ways to keep men in employment while respecting the regulations that keep them away from areas where MDDM (Male Dominated Decision Making) might impact businesses.

Reconfiguring the workplace to provide men with a role where their weaknesses don't matter is helping to keep the economy moving.

Danielle Provost was one of the first to campaign for public spaces that were safe for women.

New Order's introduction of designated leash-zones for males was just part of their response to the popular support her proposals won.

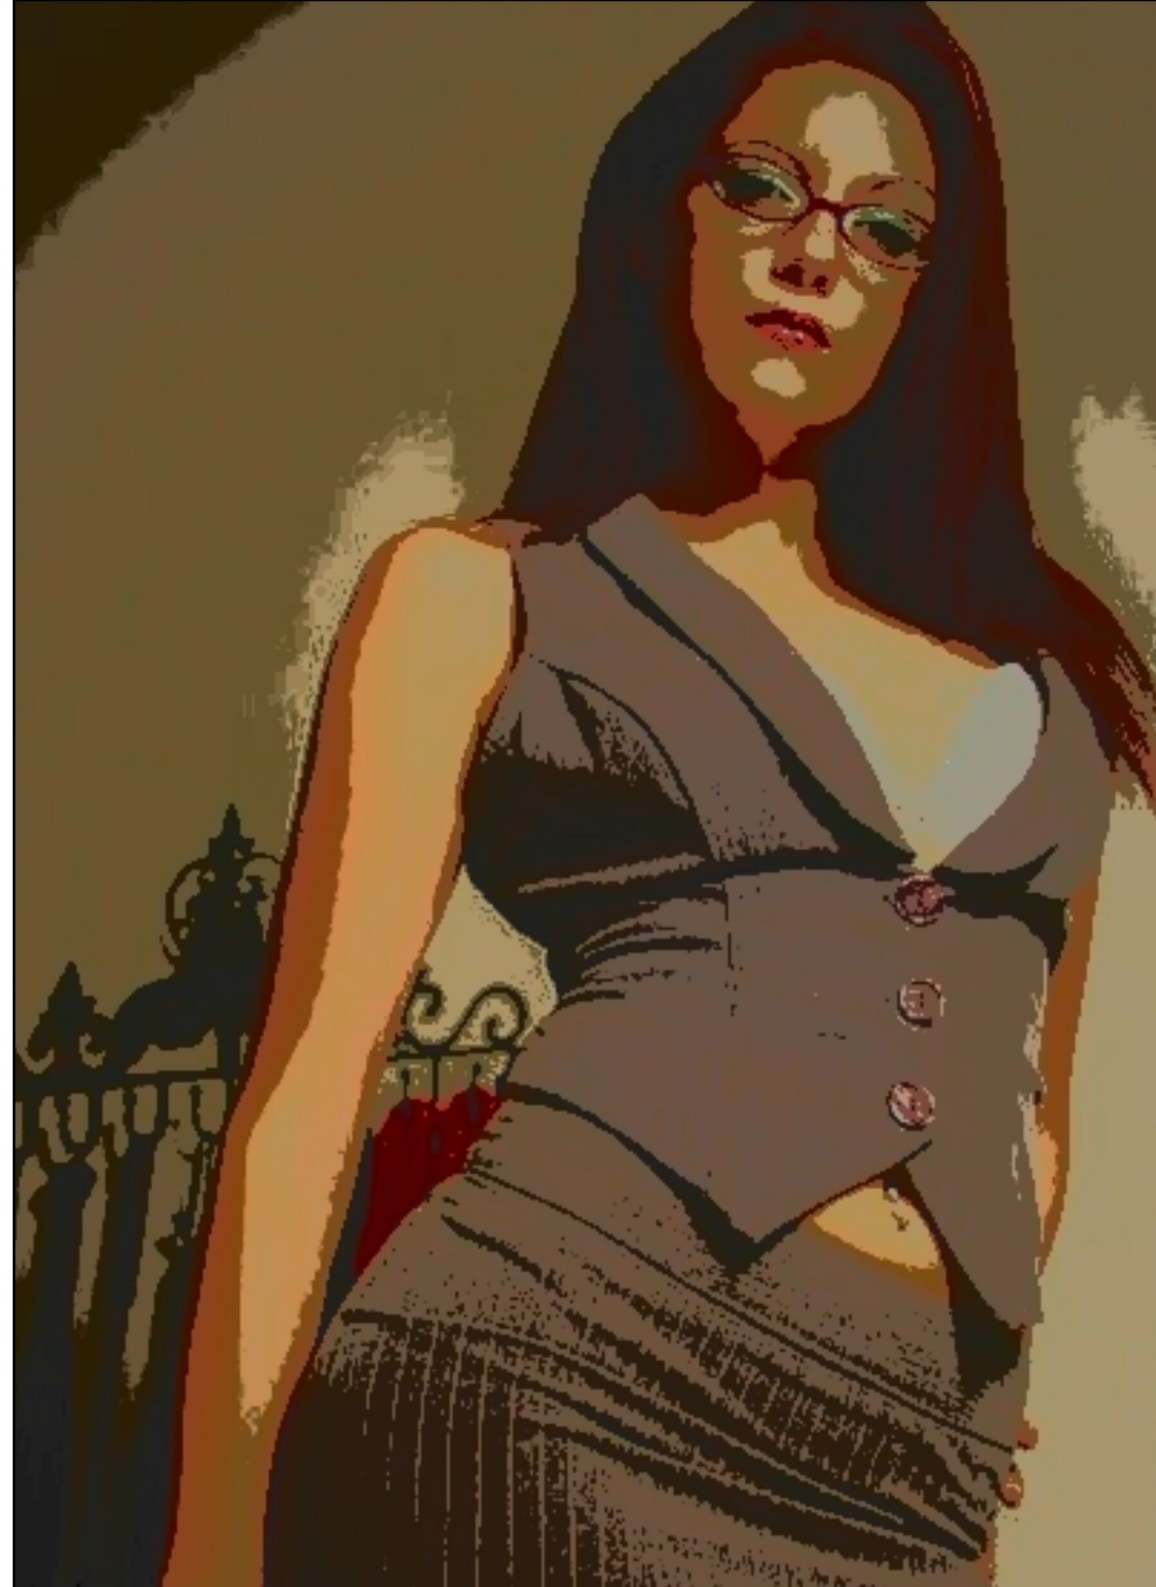

Leash-zones have now been added to by male-exclusion zones and woman-only public transport services as a direct result of Danielle's work.

Economist Angela Hanning has been advising the Treasury since the first New Order government was elected.

Her work has allowed the Government to seize billions of pounds in illegally held male assets which have been diverted to the woman most appropriate to hold them, or to the national exchequer if none can be found.

Funds raised by Angela are fuelling the New Order revolution.

Gillian Dacre's chain of health clubs spas and beauty treatment centres were among the first to take advantage of the new employment arrangements for men and were soon popular places for women to relax and recharge.

Helping men to redeploy from decision-making positions into roles in the service industry has allowed unemployment rates to be kept low while ensuring MDDM in the workplace is minimised.

Multi-instrumental musician and singer Wistra has set down the soundtrack of the New Order revolution.

Her number one albums, "What Are You Doing Out Of The Kitchen, Boy?" and "Get Down and Get Busy" as well as her single re-working "Push It" with the lyric "Lick It, Lick It Real Good" have endeared her to pop music fans and to FLR enthusiasts alike.
